Field of the Invention The invention is related to the field of integrated circuits, and more particularly, to techniques for monitoring the temperature of one or more dice on an integrated circuit. 2. Description of the Related Art FIG. 1 is a diagram depicting a method 100 for monitoring the temperature of a die of an integrated circuit according to the prior art. The integrated circuit is a microprocessor on an integrated circuit. As shown in FIG. 1, method 100 begins when the integrated circuit is powered up and the integrated circuit reaches the operating voltage. Next, method 100 determines if the integrated circuit has been fully loaded with instructions. The term fully loaded has the meaning that all of the instructions and other instructions have been placed into a processor cache, all of the data is in a processor data cache, and the logic is all enabled. If the integrated circuit has been fully loaded with instructions, method 100 continues. If the integrated circuit has not been fully loaded, then method 100 determines if there is a need to calibrate the integrated circuit's thermal detector (e.g., a thermocouple). To calibrate the thermal detector, method 100 determines if there is an ambient temperature near the thermal detector. The thermal detector senses the ambient temperature and provides an output signal indicating the ambient temperature. If an ambient temperature is near the thermal detector, method 100 will typically calibrate the thermal detector to increase or decrease the output signal to reflect the ambient temperature at the location of the thermal detector. After method 100 calibrates the thermal detector, method 100 will typically power off the integrated circuit. To do so, method 100 suspends all clocks and power on all power rails of the integrated circuit. When the integrated circuit is powered off, method 100 may also turn off the power to the thermal detector. Next, method 100 determines the temperature of the integrated circuit. To do so, method 100 identifies the most commonly used module on the integrated circuit
